

Let's Go Places

Inland Children's Chorus Thrills Large Audience At Art Institute

WITH A. S. KANY

Dayton's pride and joy in junior musical circles, the Inland Children's chorus, as usual came through with a thoroughly satisfactory account of itself when it sang yesterday afternoon at the Dayton Art institute. The concert was the first of a series of Sunday afternoon programs arranged through the music committee of the Dayton Chamber of Commerce, of which Herbert Nonneman is chairman.

Richard
Westbrock

The full chorus of 50 girls and 50 boys, such as appeared before Christmas with the Philharmonic orchestra, participated, the same arrangement of tiered platform being used. Raymond Sovey, New York stage designer, who originated this setup some seven years ago when Wallace Whittaker, general manager of Inland, first proposed the idea, came on to see that the effects were carried through properly yesterday.

The children sang in their finished fashion under the eagle eye of their director, Richard Westbrook, voices blending beautifully and all the pertinent points of splendid singing being handled to the utmost satisfaction of everyone. For many of those who packed the auditorium it was a first performance, and to them not only the singing but the entire decorum of the youngsters was a revelation. Mr. Whittaker, who is now in service, should feel proud of his proteges when he receives a report of the concert—and "Whit" will, for there are few things closer to his heart.

The children sang the "Invocation to St. Cecelia" reverently. They put joy into the lilting measures of Tschaikowsky's "Sleeping Beauty" waltz. Their "Prayer" by Humperdinck and Vittoria's "Ave Maria" again found them in more serious mood, from which they turned gaily to the lighter measures of "Cossack Cradle Song"; "A Violin Singing in the Street," an Ukrainian folksong, and Lasso's "Echo Song."

With the lights revealing hardly more than their faces, they concluded the program with their annual masterpiece, "Silent Night," which the children do so effectively that it touches something down deep inside the listener. Mary Werner McCash and Isabel Herbst were the efficient accompanists.

Sovey, who among his recent work staged "Arsenic and Old Lace," declared in a short talk that what he does for the chorus here is more exciting than any of his other tasks. "What is going to become of our culture if children have not learned the joy of singing?" he asked—which seems a fair question with only one satisfactory answer. Siegfried Weng, museum director, characterized the institute a community living-room with its varied activities. He told us afterward that more than 1,400 persons visited the place yesterday, almost a record.

January 11, 1943*
The Dayton Herald
[Concert Program Missing]

*The January 10, 1943 performance at the Dayton Art Institute (DAI) was the first of a Sunday afternoon winter series sponsored by the Chamber of Commerce. The Chorus would perform at these concerts for 27 years and enjoy "the largest following on the Sunday Afternoon Series." — 1954 DAI program

Gifted Singing Group Listed To Open Free Concert Series

The Inland Children's chorus which for several years has been delighting Dayton audiences by appearing with the Philharmonic orchestra in the presentation of Christmas programs is to give a

Record Libraries Given To Women In War

Phonograph record libraries contributed to the armed forces by prominent persons in the music world have now passed a total of 100, according to Armed Forces Master Records, Inc., a voluntary organization sponsored by outstanding musicians.

The latest contribution is two libraries of 100 records each, which Helen Traubel, Metropolitan Opera recital this afternoon at 5 o'clock at the Art institute under the direction of Richard Westbrook. Mary Werner MacCash will be at the organ. There will be no admission charge.

Raymond Sovey, New York stage designer, among whose recent accomplishments was the setting for "Arsenic and Old Lace," will arrange setting and lighting effects for the concert.

This is the first in a series of programs which are to be given through the remainder of the winter and the early spring under the sponsorship of the Chamber of Commerce music committee. The Inland chorus is appearing through the courtesy of the Inland Manufacturing company. The program follows:

I

- Invocation to St. Cecelia...Harris
- Sleeping Beauty Waltz.....
- Tschaikowsky
- Flight Into Egypt.....Bruch
- Prayer..... Humperdinck
- Gallery News.....Siegfried Weng

II

- Ave Maria...Vittoria (1540-1613)
- Cossack Cradle Song.....Raines
- A Violin Is Singing in the Street.....Ukranian Folk Song
- Echo Song.....Lasso (1532-1594)

Inland Children's Chorus To Sing At Art Institute

SECOND public appearance of the Inland Children Singers will be made Sunday at the Dayton Art Institute at 5 p. m., for the first program sponsored by the Chamber of Commerce music committee. The chorus' previous program this season was its annual Christmas concert with the Dayton Philharmonic orchestra.

The chorus, which is directed by Richard Westbrook, is comprised of 100 young singers who have been chosen carefully for the concert. Mary Werner MacCash is accompanist for the group.

Since one of the most unique angles to the appearance of the Inland chorus is the exquisite settings arranged for the ensemble, Raymond Soby, noted stage designer who most recently designed the sets for the production "Arsenic and Old Lace," arrived in Dayton Saturday to supervise plans for the performance. The familiar blue and silver theme which is associated with the Inland chorus will be repeated in the Art Institute auditorium.

The chorus will sing for the Sunday afternoon program choral works which it has done with the Dayton Philharmonic orchestra on previous occasions, among them Harris' "Invocation to St. Cecelia,"

Richard Westbrook

Tschaikowsky's "Sleeping Beauty Waltz," Bruch's "Flight Into Egypt" and Humperdinck's lovely and familiar "Prayer." Sung in a cappella fashion will be Vittoria's "Ave Maria," the "Cossack Cradle Song" by Raines, "A Violin Is Singing in the Street," a Ukranian folk song and Lasso's "Echo Song."