C. F. Kettering To Speak At Memorial Hall

Charles F. Kettering, vice president of General Motors in charge of research, will speak from the stage of Memorial hall Sunday afternoon during the Christmas program of the Dayton Philharmonic orchestra and the Inland Children's chorus.

About 12 General Motors executives are expected to attend the concert with Kettering, who on this occasion will be making his first local public speaking appearance for a considerable time.

The Inland chorus of 100 voices, 50 boys and 50 girls, consists of children of employes of the Inland division of General Motors, under the direction of Richard Westbrook. The annual appearance at Christmas time with the orchestra, directed by Paul Katz, has been one of the season's musical highlights for several years.

The concert will be given at 3 p. m.

Reviews note that Kettering declared the work of both orchestra and chorus "just as essential as factories and stores, a fundamental building block just as important as schools and churches." See the following page.

Let's Go Places 1945

With ARTHUR S. KANY

The Christmas music season got under way to an excellent start yesterday what with three organizations offering concerts for public attendance.

The concert of the Dayton Philharmonic orchestra and the Inland Children's chorus, now almost "traditional" locally, drew virtually a capacity audience to Memorial hall. In addition, the Music Appreciation chorus sang in the Dayton Art Institute, and the Rotary Boys' choir repeated its fine Christmas program in Westminster church.

The Inland Children's chorus, ably trained and directed by Richard Westbrook, numbering 50 boys and 50 girls, appeared in their customary dress and formed an entrancing picture when tiered on the stage. In front of them was the orchestra, flanked on both sides with whitened Christmas trees illuminated by hundreds of tiny blue lights.

Raymond Sovey, New York stage designer, came on to add some new and extremely effective lighting effects to those he has provided through the years. These reached their climax in the concluding number, with the stage bathed in a soft blue haze as the chorus sang "Silent Night."

The children first sang the "Gloria" from Mozart's "Twelfth Mass." This was given with the orchestra as was the final number of the first group, the lilting Strauss waltz, "Tales From the Vienna Woods," both directed by Paul Katz, conductor of the orchestra.

Westbrook took over for a group of numbers, which the youngsters sang without accompaniment, achieving some marvelously fine tonal effects. These numbers were: "Iris," by McClosky; "Song of the Wedding Pie," a Russian folk song; "Pat-a-Pan," a Burgundian air, and "The Shepherds' Christmas Song," a Swiss folk song.

It was in the second group, however, that the children gave the greatest pleasure, for here they sang the familiar yuletide songs they know so well and which fit the season. These included "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing," "O Little Town of Bethlehem," "Adeste Fideles" and "Silent Night."

At this late date it seems hardly necessary to comment not only on the splendid training the boys and girls are receiving under Westbrook but on the appreciation of good music they are absorbing, all of which make their lives richer in years to come.

Charles F. Kettering, vice president of General Motors in charge of research, heard the chorus for the first time and told us he thought it "wonderful." Facetiously he said that he had sort o' lost contact with such events here since "I haven't been able to get a job in Dayton in 20 years."

He strongly indorsed both orchestra and chorus, declaring this work "just as essential as factories and stores, a fundamental building block just as important as schools and churches." He hoped to see the Philharmonic as one of the links in a chain of progress in the world to come, he said.

The orchestra presented a varied program. Opening was Corelli's "Christmas Concerto" for string instruments only, solo bits being taken by Milton Wohl and Arthur Clarke Jr., violinists and Eleanor Foster, cello. This was followed by the rousing "Roman Carnival," by Berlioz.

In the second part of the program the orchestra played Mousorgsky's introduction to "The Break of Day" from "Khovanschina" and the bombastic "1812 Overture" by Tschaiakowsky. Even without the fireworks which the band provides at the close of each season at Island park, this was a "noisy" affair.

At the next concert, Jan. 17, the Met's leading mezzo-soprano, Kerstin Thorberg, will make her first Dayton appearance as soloist, providing the major part of the program.
